Soderbergh Paints a Sprawling War on Drugs

By Adele Marley

Traffic
Directed by Steven Soderbergh
Opens Jan. 5

NEW! WATCH A CLIP

Drugs sell themselves. As Chris Rock quipped, no trafficker ever looks wondering how he was going to that crack.

A comic provocateur such as Rock can puncture the myths of America's War on Drugs with a one-liner, but Hollywood has spinelessly avoided any such discourse on the subject. Steven Soderbergh's new film is an exception. Traffic is a sweeping polemic, critically examining the country's current anti-drug strategies and the motivations behind them, and making the continued emphasis on targeting supply rather than demand seem like a Sisyphean endeavor at best.

Any movie that earnestly takes on a Big Issue risks being labeled a D-R-A-G by multiplex patrons, but Traffic is genuinely engaging, if only because of the visual armada Soderbergh has at his disposal. Based on the late-'80s British TV miniseries Traffik, the film deploys dozens of characters in three interwoven but
